'Watchdog' Asked For Congress on U. S. Intelligence

A watchdog committee to oversee workings of the nation's intelligence agencies was proposed in the closing hours of Congress today. Representative Ned Donahue, Democrat of Connecticut, introduced a resolution to create a "Joint Committee on the Intelligence Community." The unit would have seven members from each house of Congress, eight from the House being members of committees now exercising some surveillance over intelligence activities. "We see and fear of change in the existing establishment, and a desire for one committee, composed of action-oriented men, we do not have sufficient information to wish to base our own judgment of these matters so long as no committee exists to oversee the entire intelligence community," said Donahue.
